Dear Friends and Partners,

Sick babies, vacuums and microwaves. What do they all have in common? Hard to guess for most, but for me they are a flurry of things that went sideways in my house last week. It brings to mind the old adage trouble comes in threes.

Our challenges were small this month but what about months when you're hit with bigger and longer lasting bumps in your path? The ones that go from speed bumps to small mountains. Deepak Chopra wrote that America's safety net is unraveling to the point where an illness can wipe-out a middle class family.

In Canada (and Japan) we have relatively good health care systems, especially when compared to elsewhere in the world. Last week our son Ronan had a cold that went to his chest (bronchitis) and had to spend the night in hospital getting an I.V. That was worrying to say the least. We are fortunate to be able to move our schedules around to look after our little guy.

It makes you consider weaving the safety net even finer and stronger to protect yourself more. That may mean increased flexibility around your job or in your business or greater control over your finances; magnifying the point that creating a wall of financial security around your family is paramount.

The microwave and vacuum? They blew up the same day and were easily replaced.

Oil And Our Lives

By PETER HADEKEL, The Gazette May 23, 2009

Last spring, when oil prices were breaking through $145 U.S. a barrel, Jeff Rubin went out on a limb. Then serving as chief economist for CIBC World Markets, Rubin predicted that oil was headed much higher: to $225 a barrel within four years. He didn't have a lot of company among fellow economists, many of whom were predicting an imminent end to the oil bubble. READ FULL ARTICLE

'Green Shoots' Abound, But Where Is The Economic Ash?

Stephen Marche, Weekend Post Published: Friday, May 22, 2009

The Economist is reporting that, in the last week of April, there were 68 references to economic "green shoots" in the world's major media. At the end of 2008, there were none. The journalistic cliché of the moment has been growing in prominence consistently, and its overuse, while distressing for those who love originality of thought and expression, is good news for everyone else. GRAB THIS STORY.

Total SA's 95 Theory

Eric Reguly, PARIS – Globe and Mail Update, Thursday, May. 21, 2009

For Total SA, it's all about 95. The French oil giant builds its business with 95 in mind, as if the figure were tattooed on its executives' foreheads. The figure refers to Total's belief, not shared by the majority of Big Oil players, that global production will top out at 95 million barrels a day after 2020. That's only about 10 million more than current production. READ MORE.
